

The befuddling privilege

Annu Thapa
Jacobs University Bremen

January 17, 2014

1 Abstract

Deconstruction gives the general idea about the absence of truth since truth is not objective. The theory inspires us to challenge the theory of privilege, which always implies and summons its binary disparaged.

There is no Truth about privilege. Whether a certain term is privilege or disparaged depends on our experience. The word 'submissive' is taken positive by the people of some south-eastern society, which holds a belief that a submissive woman is a perfect wife. On the other hand, the word is taken negative by the western countries, which believes in woman empowerment. Similarly, the word 'fat' has a negative connotation for the western people, who aspire to have trimmed bodies. In antithesis, some people take it as a positive term that displays ones wealth.

Is there any statement which can be true universally? If one seeks truth and analyse it for its verity, what process should one undergo? If one seeks for existence of God, prays during bad times, how can existence of devil be denied? Actually, its what ones brain gets trained in the environment from childhood to adolescence, that builds a wall where certain things will be categorized as privileged and certain as disparaged. Its matter of how brain is trained to be perceived.

Now, out of inquisitive human behaviour when one sees the difference in truth, how same thing are perceived in different part of world, then the wall that separates privilege and disparage starts to tremor. If we take theory of relativity into account, it explains it all. All the truth or facts are relative. Either you need comparison or perception, then what seems fact or decent seems the opposite. If you are sitting on a chair in home, should you consider yourself moving or resting? For a person just next to you, the answer would be resting. But since Earth is moving at constant velocity, arent you moving?

The difference between privilege and disparage terms are relative and cant exist or be explained rationally without existence of other. Further, this also depends on environment that one is brought upon.